

Getaway Takeaways

Three tropical vacation discoveries worth bringing back home with you.

The Setai Miami Beach spa looks out onto spectacular pools.

The Massage:

At the spa at The Setai in Miami Beach, all treatments are done with Thémaé, a French skincare brand you can't get anywhere else in the U.S. Devotees of the tea-extract-infused line try it once—even in the hotel's skincare minibar, the $100 Spa Bar by Thémaé—and have to have more. This balm, used in massages and pedicures, is ultra-moisturizing, subtly scented and wildly luxurious.

SHOP NOW!
Thémaé Paris
Baume des Quatre
Thés, $86

➔ TAP FOR PHOTO CREDITS

A bath at Coqui Coqui Tulum—and the bath oil to go with it.

SHOP NOW!
Coqui Coqui
Perfumes
Coco-Coco
Bath Oil, $60

The Bath:

Coqui Coqui, a mini empire of four small, celeb-packed inns dotting the Yucatán Peninsula in Mexico, is best known for its eco-rustic-chic design (there's no electricity—with handmade candles as night-lights—and Mayan crafts decorate the rooms), but its exquisite perfumes have been there from the start. Now the 11 sought-after scents can be had beyond the resort. Our favorite, this coconut oil that's used in Coqui Coqui's spas, makes an amazingly restorative bath that leaves skin soft, silky and with the lingering scent of the tropics.

The Abs:

You can bike from your stunning wood-and-glass villa at Amanyaara to the resort's lush 1.5-acre spa. Guests who take Amanyaara Pilates by Erika Bloom—there's a full studio with reformers and jumpboards—go back again and again (your body starts to change after even a few sessions). Bloom has studios in New York City, Connecticut and the Hamptons, and she'll make custom home workouts for guests who live elsewhere.

Where to swim, post-pilates, at Amanyaara on Turks and Caicos.

